As we know, the native language of both the US and the UK is English. But do you know what kind of English you are learning now? In Taiwan, most of us learn American English, not British English. They are a little different in accents and word usage. Let's take a look at the differences between British English and American English. In American English, you eat cookies and candy; in British English, you eat biscuits and sweets. In American English, you play soccer; in British English, you play football. In American English, pants are long to your feet; in British English, pants are a piece of short underwear. In American English, you take the subway to other places; in British English, you take the Tube. The next time you watch TV or movies, try to listen to the accents and words and guess where the people come from.

native language 母語; British English 英式英文; accent 口音, usage 使用; difference 差異; underwear 內衣褲
