Helen was a very kind and pretty woman. Before she got married, lots of young men were in love with her.

Many of them wrote to her, telling her how wonderful she was, how much they loved her and wanted to marry her.

Helen kept all these letters. She tied them up with a red ribbon and put them away in an old box. After being happily married, she never looked at them. However, they were a part of her life and she didn't want to throw them away.

Tina, Helen's daughter, was six. One day, Helen had to leave Tina alone for half an hour. "Now be a good girl," she said. "Play quietly. If you need anything, go to the lady next door."

When Helen returned home, she asked Tina, "Have you been a good girl?" "Oh, yes, Mommy." Tina answered.

"What did you do when I was out?" Helen asked her. "I played mailman." Tina told her. "How could you play mailman, darling?" Helen asked. "You didn't have any letters." "Oh, yes, I did, Mommy." A woman woke up one morning with a bad earache. The pain was so bad that she visited a doctor. The doctor was very busy, so she had to wait a long time in the waiting room. While the woman was waiting, the pain got worse. Also a piece of string began to grow out of her ear.

When the doctor saw the woman, he was very surprised. "There seems to be a piece of string coming out of your ear," he said. Carefully he began to pull the string. Inch by inch, he pulled the piece of string out of her ear. Then it wouldn't come any further. "There seems to be something at the end of the string," the doctor said. "I will have to pull harder." He began to pull harder, but the pain was so great the woman asked him to stop. "I must take out no matter what is in your ear," the doctor told her. "I will give something to help you sleep while I take it out."

The doctor gave the woman a sleeping gas, and soon she was in a deep sleep. He called the nurse to help him, and together they pulled on the piece of string. Suddenly there was a sound, and out of the woman's ear came a large bunch of roses. To the doctor's surprise, he never saw anything like this before.

When the woman woke up, he said, "I pulled a large bunch of roses out of your ear. Do you know where they came from?" "Wasn't there a card with them?" the woman asked him.
